Making the transition into postsecondary education

By Jesse Moya

With the stroke of a pen, Governor Michelle Lujan Grisham signed an executive order Jan. 3, 2019, ending PARCC, the only test used by New Jersey and the District of Columbia. The test, which is now only administered in places like Kentucky and the District of Columbia, has been met with criticism by New Mexico- based organizations and educators. Teachers and parents are hopeful about the change.

Lujan Grisham has been working on legislation in the New Mexico Legislature that “will be working on for their futures.”

“I believe we need to design and implement a system of accountability that measures what matters and drive studen-"
